After ‘Blackfish’ and Cecil, could the member of PETA sees a shift in the travel paradigm

In a bygone era, the general public didn’t think twice about bullfighting. Beachfront or zoo-based marine parks that featured captive or near-captive whales were considered ethical. Today, however, many are questioning these practices, both the ethical and the financial. Recent events, such as the death of Cecil, the lion at Hwange National Park in Zimbabwe, have led to a shift in consumer behavior. In fact, many are turning to aquariums and zoos that focus on ethical treatments of animals, rather than keeping them in captivity.

In the case of the marine parks, the argument is often made that these animals are better off in captivity than in the wild. However, many animal rights activists do not agree. They argue that keeping these animals in captivity does more harm than good. For example, fish have been known to die within days of being captured, and dolphins have been seen displaying aggressive behavior in captivity.

Many people who work with or care about animals are also inspired by animal sanctuaries as they see the firsthand effect that captivity can have on animals. Many animal sanctuaries are worth a visit, as they are often more ethical than the zoos and marine parks. For example, people can visit an animal sanctuary and see how they care for their animals, rather than just see the animals for entertainment. In fact, some animal sanctuaries even allow visitors to help care for the animals, such as feeding them or cleaning their enclosures.
